RE: ROBODIALING and UNWANTED CALLS

Dear FCC,

I was a victim of harassment with 921 unwanted robo-dialed calls in a three month period which resulted in me seeking consumer protection from a law firm. Thank God there was some form of protection in place.

I needed the ability to revoke my consent to these annoying calls and I needed the consumer protection laws that are in place. We hired attorneys Rex Anderson and Peter F. Barry and they did an excellent job representing us.

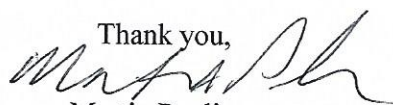

The amount of stress this caused me and my family is very hard to describe. It caused me great anxiety and need for counseling and need for some form of legal protection. I sought legal counsel and was involved in a law suit which gave me protection and STOPPED all further unwanted calls.

I feel it would be a HUGE mistake to allow industry regulator's to try and change these consumer protection laws under the TCPA.

There is no reason why I could not be called by a live person from any company. If I do business with someone I need to call and ask for them personally. Why should a company be allowed to use computer generation technology to harass a person continually? Plus, many times a day and night?

I needed the right to be able to stop this kind of harassment.

Please do not change these laws and keep the TCPA laws in place.

Thank you,

Martin Pugliese
